ORGANIZATIONAL AND MANAGEMENT PLAN

A company that lacks sufficient job descriptions, which can lead to irregularities, confusion, and potential conflicting obligations, will eventually go out of business owing to poor management and organization. This cooperative's orderly operational structure and appropriate job descriptions are due to this.

Chief executive officer (CEO)

This individual in the organization is in charge of making important decisions, securing resources for the business, and implementing structural and operational changes that have a direct impact on organizational growth. This position can be interchanged with the president in smaller companies, and it's typical for an owner to hold this position.

Chief operating officer (COO)

The company's operations are managed by the COO. In smaller firms, the general manager, who performs duties akin to those of a COO, may assume this post. These executive positions monitor various departments to make sure staff members are completing their task properly and on time. They also make sure processes are running smoothly.

Chief financial officer or controller (CFO)

The cash flow and financial success of a company are the responsibility of the controller, sometimes known as the CFO. Within major firms, a CFO and controller are often two distinct business jobs; however, smaller organizations may merge these two roles into one job title. While the controller keeps an eye on the business's expenses and assets, the chief financial officer is typically in charge of locating investors and outside funding opportunities for the company's growth.

Chief marketing officer (CMO)

This individual oversees a company's whole marketing division, organizes marketing budgets, and manages marketing initiatives. Multiple marketing teams, each with a team leader or marketing manager, may fall under the purview of this position. Additionally, the CMO typically has the last say in the creation and execution of numerous marketing initiatives.

Chief technology officer (CTO)

This individual oversees the organization's technology operations. They frequently adopt new technological trends and make sure that any technology they bring satisfies the requirements of their business. The CTO is in charge of the top-level operations in businesses with sizable IT divisions.

Marketing manager

Depending on the size of the business, a marketing manager is responsible for managing the entire marketing department. Within the marketing department of large organizations, there may be several teams, each with a separate marketing manager. Each manager submits a report to the CMO in person. The marketing manager may be the only top-level position in smaller companies responsible for managing marketing initiatives.

Product manager

Our product managers do market research on products and streamline the procedures involved in their development. The product manager may concentrate their efforts on studying target markets for customers, reviewing popular items, analyzing rival products, and working with marketing teams to establish methods for product promotion.

Project manager

Many of the planning and development stages of corporate projects are managed by project managers. These experts plan, start, oversee, manage, and complete projects. They frequently collaborate with other department managers, such as marketing and product managers, to plan and develop every aspect of a project, including its budget, resources, and timelines. This business role may also be charged with the additional task of analyzing and mitigating risks to various projects.

Finance manager

In order to create financial reports, finance managers often examine expenditures and revenues. This position may manage numerous financial aspects of business operations in smaller firms, including estimating and calculating incoming revenue and business expenses. They depend on the work of these experts to produce accurate financial reports and forecasts, and in larger businesses, the finance manager may be in charge of managing staff accountants and bookkeepers.

Human resources manager

The human resources department is managed by human resources managers. They may be in charge of several staff members in smaller firms or huge teams within the human resources division. Due to the fact that they recruit, interview, hire, and onboard personnel, this business job is essential for operations. For the purpose of starting strategic planning and serving as a link between upper-level management and the workforce, HR managers frequently interact with senior executives.

Customer service representative

Our customer service representatives help customers solve problems, handle product returns and refunds and resolve issues when customers are unsatisfied. These operational roles are essential for building a reputation for their company and fostering long-lasting customer relationships.
